"I believe that right now, Queens is the closest you can come to authentic Korean food," said Hoon Kim, the chef of Danji and Hanjin in Manhattan and a frequent prowl of Northern Boulevard. Unlike the restaurants on 32nd Street in Manhattan, Mr. Kim said, "the kitchens actually cook for Koreans." And while there are excellent Korean places in and around Fort Lee, N.J., some of which have sibling branches in Queens, Mr. Kim said the flavors along Northern Boulevard are closer to what he has tasted on his trips to South Korea.

"A lot of the restaurants in Queens are opened by first-generation people, who know what's being served in Korea now," he said. For people who don't speak Korean, language isn't the main barrier to eating well in this part of town. The greater challenge is figuring out where to go for which foods. When Koreans go out for a meal, they tend to first decide what they're going to eat, then choose a restaurant that does it especially well.

If you don't know what the house specialty is when you arrive, menus may not help. Take the hub of restaurants around the Murray Hill station on the Long Island Rail Road, as good a place as any to start. People in the know would head to Mapo Korean BBQ if they were in the mood for marinated short-ribs, or kalbi.

We can blame the IRT. The No. 7 train was never meant to celebrate the city's great ethnic-food districts. For variety of dishes and excellence of cooking, the only areas that compete are the Japanese clusters in the East Village and the East 40s or the city's three Chinatowns. Koreans in the West 30s, which was once strong, doesn't even get on the scoreboard.

But the last stop on the Flushing Local line is just the beginning of Korean strip. It stretches east for about five more miles, following Long Island Rail Road tracks and Northern Boulevard all the way to Nassau County. There are hundreds of restaurants in Murray Hill, Astoria, Bayside and beyond, serving famous dishes and obscure ones: beef barbecue and blood sausage; noodles in deep steaming bowls and live octopus; Korean-Chinese restaurants and Korean-French bakeries; beefy pubs and dross espresso bars; chicken fried in a shattering crust of rice and chicken boiled whole with ginseng.
